

Once upon a time, there was a little boy called Johnny. Johnny and his parents were supposed to attend a recital for Johnny's sister, Sarah. Johnny, wanting to stay at home instead, pretended he was sick and unable to get out of bed. His parents wondered whether they should stay at home to take care of Johnny, but at the behest of Johnny, they still decided to go and support Sarah. However, they made sure to leave some medicine by the nightstand and to notify their neighbors that Johnny was staying at home alone.

After making sure that his parents have left, Johnny went into the living room and began watching his favorite TV show. Just as he was getting ready to go back to his room, he heard a quiet knock at the front door. Thinking it was probably his neighbors, Johnny opened the door. However, instead of a familiar face, he saw an elderly woman with a cane, shivering in the winter cold. "Sorry for bothering you, but I got lost. Could I come in and make a call to my family?," the old lady asked. Even though Johnny's parents told him to never invite a stranger into the home, he felt bad for leaving an old lady out in the cold and welcomed her in.

As the old lady started to make a call, the power in the entire neighborhood suddenly went out. After about 5 minutes, the power came back and everything went back to normal. However, when Johnny's family returned home about 20 minutes later, Johnny was nowhere to be found. Everything in the room seemed to be as they left it, aside from a new voicemail left on the phone. When Johnny's parents played the voicemail, all they heard was Johnny screaming "Help, Help, Help!" and a high-pitched laugh.

Upon hearing the creepy voicemail, Johnny's parents immediately rushed to their neighbors and ask if they saw anything strange. However, apart from the brief power outage, they did not see anyone or anything out of the ordinary. Even when they checked the surveillance footage from the camera in the doorway, nothing suspicious showed up. Although they also called the police, when the police arrived, the voicemail was suddenly gone – giving the police no evidence at all.

When the news spread about the sudden disappearance of Johnny, everyone was shocked and in disbelief. Nonetheless, no one ever knew what happened to him. Yet, from time to time, when they were alone, several children claimed to have heard a faint knock at their door...